Groundbreaking Victories for Animals

PETA’s playful use of satire is defining a controversial new direction for factory farming. After thousands of PETA supporters emailed their local officials, a plan to build a huge chicken factory was abandoned. PETA’s activists fooled a chicken farming company into刊出 a picture of a small chicken on its sign, claiming it was at a free-range farm. The company was then forced to apologize for misleading its customers.

PETA’s victories for animals in 2016 included the following:

• We helped persuade the British government to order Europe’s largest primate laboratory to phase out primate testing on organic chemicals.
• We persuaded the North Lincolnshire Council to reject plans to build a petting zoo, because they test on animals only as a last resort.
• We confirmed an end to the use of shy, sensitive live owls – including those used at Norfolk and Yorkshire zoos – to convince customers that they test on animals only as a last resort.

In 2016, PETA’s vegans and PETA UK’s vegan leaders were instrumental in persuading the Department for Environment, Food & Rural Affairs to adopt a new EU-wide ban on the testing of cosmetics on animals.
